In their excellent volume titled Understanding the Times: A Survey of Competing Worldviews (Manitou Springs, CO: Summit Ministries, 2016, p. 100), Jeff Myers and David A. Noebel describe competing economic systems. They define socialism as "an economic system based upon governmental or communal ownership of the means of production and distribution of goods and services," and capitalism or free enterprise as "an economic system in which capital assets are privately owned, and the prices, production, and distribution of goods and services are determined by competition within a free market."

Note that a critical difference between socialism and free enterprise relates to property and other assets. Socialism calls for collective ownership and control of property and wealth, and capitalism upholds the ideals of private property and property rights. Karl Marx himself said, "The theory of Communism [socialism's ideological sister] may be summed up in one sentence: Abolish all private property."

Therefore, at the outset, we must realize that in the debate between socialism and free enterprise, property and property rights are linchpin issues. You can't have socialism with private property ownership and management, and you can't have a free-market economy without them. Here's what this means: You tell me what you believe about private property and property rights, and I'll be able to tell you whether you're a socialist or an advocate of free enterprise.

What does the Bible say about socialism and free enterprise? Does it tell us anything? With the above information in mind, let's consider four Bible verses.

First, Exodus 20:15 forbids stealing. Without private property, theft could not occur, so the Eighth Commandment assumes the validity and reality of private property ownership. That is a death-blow to socialism.

Second, the prohibition in Exodus 20:17 against coveting means we are to respect property rights, not merely tolerate them. Here, socialism takes another lethal hit.

Third, Ephesians 4:28 indicates the thief should stop stealing and instead must work, first to provide for himself, but also to earn enough so he can assist those really needing help. Work, pay, exercising responsibility over oneself and one's assets, and practicing charity — all of these — are inherent in this verse. Guess what? All of them are inconsistent with socialism's realities, but they align well with free-market principles in both theory and practice.

Fourth, 2 Thessalonians 3:10, Paul said that the one who will not work should not be allowed to eat. This principle validates the legitimacy of rewards and consequences proportionate to the quality and quantity of an individual's productive work. In other words, diligence and excellence should be rewarded, and laziness should be penalized. Paul not only practiced this principle when he lived and ministered among the Thessalonians; he also reminded the Thessalonians of it as a valid guideline. It devastates socialism but is a strong tenet of a free-market economic model.

Of course, advocates of socialism point to numerous Bible passages to argue that the Bible teaches socialism. We've not been able to address those in this short article, but trust me: Close examination of all of them reveals that they don't teach socialism at all but are entirely compatible with the four verses we have discussed here. This should not surprise us. Scripture does not contradict itself.

In How Christianity Changed the World, (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2004, p. 205), sociologist and historian Alvin J. Schmidt observes (emphasis added),

Just as God does not want people to be coerced in spiritual matters, so too he does not want them to be coerced in earthly matters, for instance, in their economic activities. There is not a single reference in either the Old or New Testament in which God denies economic freedom to people, as in fascism, socialism, and communism.

Don't be misled. Socialism and Scripture are incompatible — completely.

This article is available online at https://bit.ly/3whkUAP